Cigarette smoking remains one of the most important and preventable cause of morbidity and mortality in the US.

Despite its negative health effects, the vast majority of smokers (87%) want to quit smoking but can not make this transition with the current treatments. The purpose of this study is to develop a novel, laboratory-based smoking cessation paradigm, which should facilitate the development of a potential novel treatment for cigarette smokers. Unlike previous studies, our treatment will not require long-term administration of medication for its therapeutic effect, but rather will comprise a brief daily exposure to one of several novel psychosocial interventions that are aimed to change various forms of cognitive biases and predispositions in smokers. In particular, we will administer a single session of the Stop Smoking Helping Compassionate Program (SSHCP), a novel intervention that appears to prevent relapse in patients who have attempted to quit smoking. Patients who have successfully completed an initial 14-day smoking cessation program will participate in a pretreatment baseline assessment session. They will be randomly assigned to one of 4 conditions in which they receive, for the next 14 days, different types of interventions. The three main intervention conditions will involve (1) a 'Novel Intervener' condition in which participants will be treated with a brief intervention that will involve viewing one of two available smoking cessation programs on a computer and listening to a neutral interviewer talk about their smoking, (2) a 'Stop Smoking Helping Compassionate Program' condition in which participants will be treated with one of two available smoking cessation programs (i.e., Quit Smoking Now and Quit Smoking Together). These programs will involve a brief intervention. The fourth condition will be a control condition in which participants will receive only a brief pre-treatment assessment. All participants will be reassessed 24 hours after the pre-treatment assessment session and at 1, 6 and 12 months after completing the 14-day smoking cessation program. Smoking abstinence at 1, 6 and 12 months will be assessed by expired-air carbon monoxide, as well as self-report. Participants will be interviewed at 3, 6, and 12 month post-baseline about their subjective experience of the interventions they received. Several cognitive biases (e.g., implicit biases, attentional biases, self-efficacy biases, optimism biases) have been theorized to contribute to the maintenance of smoking behavior. The rationale for this study is that the treatment-related changes in the processes and patterns of attention and thinking in smokers who have successfully quit smoking may be responsible, at least in part
