Boeing is set to receive a contract signing on Tuesday morning at Andrews Air Force Base in Maryland, with a possible award ceremony and signing in a week or two. That would have to be followed by funding of the contract by the Senate, which usually happens quickly. The company should hear from the Air Force in January about the contract award, according to two people familiar with the process. The deal is expected to be signed off on by Air Force Secretary Deborah James in the next week or so, said two people familiar with the process. James has urged the Pentagon to award the contract before leaving office next month, according to one of the people. Pentagon officials have been working on the contract award process for months as James attempts to leave a legacy of having chosen Boeing for the program. The contract in dispute is the most important of the refueling tankers that have been in development since 1986. The contract to buy the new version of the tanker, known as the KC-46A Pegasus, would be worth about $10 billion — matching a similar deal with Airbus Defense and Space in 2010. For Boeing, the contract award would be a $3.2 billion capital investment and a further $1.5 billion in production and design. In addition, Boeing would have to spend millions of dollars to retrofit production lines in Washington State and Alabama, according to Boeing's proposal. It has been a tense relationship between Boeing and the Air Force on the tanker contract, as the companies have alternated between winning and losing. The two companies, with the participation of Airbus, competed against one another, and the Boeing plane was

The latest batch of New Horizons images suggest the small, flyby-targeted spacecraft is nearing the faraway Kuiper Belt Object 2014 MU69, which was recently discovered by citizen astronomers during the Project Dark-Sky campaign. By Jet Propulsion Laboratory New Horizons has begun its final approach to a mysterious, frigid object in the Kuiper Belt, or the outermost region of the solar system. The spacecraft is nearing 2014 MU69, a flyby target located about 3 billion miles (4.8 billion kilometers) from Earth. On the morning of Dec. 19, New Horizons made its closest approach to the object, which is now about 2 billion miles (3.2 billion kilometers) from the spacecraft. New Horizons will begin its historic close-up observations of the object beginning at 9:50 a.m. PST (12:50 p.m. EST/10:50 a.m. UTC) on Dec. 22. The observations will include images that will reveal the object's size, shape, color and composition. The mission's science team began planning weeks ago in anticipation of this final, most distant encounter. The arrival of 2014 MU69 came as a surprise, though. Originally, New Horizons had been scheduled to fly by the object two years ago, but the encounter was cancelled as a result of a spacecraft malfunction. Cameras on board New Horizons showed that the spacecraft had to turn northward to protect the main antenna, as it passed within 200,000 miles (300,000 kilometers) of the Earth-Moon system. The mission team realized the spacecraft had encountered a much more distant object, which they nicknamed "Ultima Thule," or "the distant object from the future." The object is probably a captured Kuiper Belt object, an object from the cold outer edges of the solar system that doesn't have enough gravity to pull it into the inner solar system. Some scientists think that the object once belonged to a larger planet that was once surrounded by a water-rich atmosphere, but scientists can't detect any atmospheres on the object at present. In the coming weeks, New Horizons will downlink all of its images and data. The mission will then continue on to explore a Kuiper Belt object named 2015 TG387. New Horizons is currently 42 million miles (68 million km) from Earth. At that distance, radio signals take about 27 hours to reach Earth. New Horizons
